Diamonds are the world's hardest, most valuable stones. They were formed, over millions of years, deep under the earth's surface by great heat and by the weight of the rocks above. Now scientists can also make diamonds in their laboratories.

The first diamonds were found thousands of years ago in India. Since then, they have been found in more than 35 countries, including Brazil, Russia and South Africa. Today, most of the world's supply of diamonds comes from South Africa. Most diamonds are from "open" mines where large amounts of rock have to be removed so that people can get to the stones. This process can damage landscapes and be bad for the environment.

Although most people think of diamonds as jewelry, only 20% of diamonds are worn as jewelry. The other 80% are used for industrial purposes, including cutting or polishing metals.
